IRA vs SDIRA

Traditional IRA

When funds are invested in a non-self-directed IRA, they are usually managed by a brokerage house that invests the funds. Of course, the account-holder can make trading decisions and direct the brokerage. The broker must also get the account holder's permission to make trades—unless the IRA is held with a money manager who has discretionary power over the account.

Self-Directed IRA

With a Self-Directed IRA (SDIRA), which can be either a traditional IRA or Roth IRA, the account owner directs all of the investment decisions through a custodian or broker. As a result, the owner has a much greater degree of flexibility in choosing investment options. This option may also reduce the fees charged because the custodian isn't involved in the investment transactions—only the investor.
